

Monologue on personalities.

Today many people say that your personality greatly affects your career, relationships and social status. It makes you who you are. However, despite how different we all are, some personalities are considered to be better than others. If you don't like your personality, can you change it? To be honest, I don't think that whether you think or not about personality types is important. Nevertheless, it's useful to know the basics.

There are two main personality types: introversive and extroversive. It is wrong to say that introverts are shy and extroverts are talkative and that's it. The difference between them is in their attitudes to the world which can be seen through communication. Introverts often look inwards, while extroverts prefer to interact with the world around them. They both have positive and negative sides. To begin with, Introverts are able to accept other ideas and opinions much easier than extroverts. Furthermore, they prefer to think and consider before taking action and that's why it may seem that they lack confidence. On the other side, "talkative" extroverts are commonly good team players and act first and think later. Though sometimes they become good troublemakers because it's easier for them to lose their temper. Also, it's not rare to see people who have both extrovert and introvert characteristics in their personality.

It's interesting that different jobs attract different personality types. While jobs like waiters, managers, entrepreneurs, where you need to communicate with people a lot usually attract extroverts, jobs which require concentration, like computer programmers, researchers are more suitable for introverts.

Psychologists say that there are lots of ways to judge a person's character: through their gestures, the way they talk, etc. Everything about a person tells us about their personality, take, for instance, clothes. It's likely that people wearing bright clothes will have bright, extrovert personality. Psychologists do researches into such information to design personality tests.

Speaking of personality tests, these are an easy way of measuring people's intelligence, personal qualities or whatever. It is known that they have unbelievable validity and reliability, and that's why employers frequently ask their employees to do personality tests. Tests help employers to identify person's personality type and decide whether a person is suited for the job or not.

If you really want to be successful in career and reach a high post, the thing you need is charisma. And what's that? Generally, it's an ability to inspire and encourage people, to make them follow you. Take Martin Luther King. Surprisingly, he had enough charisma to bring about equality between black and white people through non-violent methods in his not so civil times. Yet, there are such people who succeed in getting other people to see them as a leader and misuse their charisma. Unfortunately, there are many famous political and military leaders who destroyed their countries and caused great harm to their people.

Many people consider charisma an inborn trait which automatically makes you successful in life and career. However, it's important to note that many has trained that quality in themselves. The most important thing that charisma gives you is self-confidence. It must be true that without self-confidence there's little to nothing that can be achieved.

I want to add that thinking of your personality being good or not too much might be harmful for your mental health. If you want to live happily, you shouldn't care about it too much, not to mention change it.

All in all, people are different, but lots of them are alike in one or another way. So, people are divided into extroverts and introverts. The main difference between people's personalities is the way they look at our world, in their attitudes to it. There are many ways to measure person's personality via specially designed tests. For some people, it's much easier to draw others to them because of a quality known as charisma, which is a good basement for an important role of a leader. However, in my opinion, personality is not something worth thinking a lot about if you want to live a happy life. After all, the things that psychologists say are global, and sometimes not relevant to certain cases we have to deal with in our life.
